Pain Attraction

Alternative doctors aren't the only ones drawn to magnets anymore, reports Kathryn Belgiorno.

As far as most devotees of conventional medicine are concerned, magnets have always seemed better suited to refrigerators than to pulled muscles. Yet ever since magnets started popping up in everything from mattresses to insoles, it's become difficult to resist their pull – and now there's scientific evidence to add weight to the claims that they can relieve pain. In a recent study, 20 patients recovering from liposuction used magnetic patches, which not only eased their discomfort but also aided the healing process: They reported less swelling after four days and less bruising after three than those who didn't use magnets. Studies involving polio victims and people with chronic foot pain had similar results. And pain may not be the only trouble magnets can treat. Research from the University of California at Los Angeles suggests they may help deliver chemotherapy drugs to tumor sites in some cancer patients.
